“I knew I wanted to experience a different part of the world and New Zealand is about as far away from home as I can get. The University of Auckland stood out as a high-quality university that had the perfect course profile for my studies. Specifically a course on industry 4.0 that I wanted to learn more about.”

“In addition to my more technical courses as an engineer, I am taking a course called Science in Aotearoa. It has been really interesting to learn about science and technology in the context of New Zealand and its history. I’ve gotten a much deeper understanding around different knowledge systems, and the ethics and cultural considerations at play in research and work.”

“Even though I’ve just scratched the surface I also feel that I’ve learned more about New Zealand history and Māori culture than I thought I would, and it has given me a lot of new perspectives that I’ll take with me in my future career and my human experience”

auckland.ac.nz/sso-courseadvice

“Studying abroad is a great way to reflect on your indigenous community in your home country, and find common ground with people who might seem to be different from you

“The Māori concept that there is no ‘wrong’ worldview is something I try to remind myself when dealing with other people from different places.

“Understanding the history and culture of the indigenous owners of the land is important to being more mindful in living and working on their land. In the United States, indigenous knowledge is a lot less known and it causes a lot more misunderstandings.

“I respect and appreciate the efforts of Māori people to restore their culture in Aotearoa. I think that this zeal and persistence is something that I would like to encourage Nigerian tribes to be more intentional in practicing.”
